Went with his father to California, in 1850, and became one of the partners in the law firm of "McAllister & Sons," in San Francisco. Came East to New York City, in 1852, where he practiced his profession, and resided until his death. His home "was an unpretentious house in Thirty-Sixth street, simply furnished but in exquisite taste; he is well known as a writer; well born and enjoying most heartily the society of cultivated and refined people. His writings are tinged with his mode of living, but they, as well as his conversation and personal characteristics, prove him to have been a man, who would have been marked in any occupation in life to which he had turned his attention. Unusually affable and polished in his manners, he had the courage of his convictions and was fearlessly out-spoken. For this reason he created a sensation in Chicago, by criticising the manners of its best people. He caused a still greater stir, by publishing a volume, entitled "Society As I Have Found It," in which he forcibly delineated the peculiarities and shortcomings of the uppermost stratum of New York society."

[Sketch of Ward McAllister in University Magazine, 1893.]
